

Champions of change are active

Identifying leaders and people of influence, including board members, staff, volunteers, coaches, officials and club members, to be champions of change is vital to becoming an inclusive sport. Champions of change will help define and influence your sports culture. They will require practical training to improve their knowledge, skills and capacity to change their own and others' behaviours and practices to support inclusion. Champions of change may lead in different ways and will often be recognised as mentors, role models and advocates. They see future possibilities and opportunities to create healthy sporting environments that are safe, accessible, inclusive and equitable.

Expectations about behaviour are met

Clearly articulating your organisation's standards and expectations about behaviour is an important step in providing inclusive sport. By developing plans (e.g. strategic, operational or action plans), policies, guidelines and procedures you can define your organisation's desired culture. Expectations about behaviour should apply to all people, at all levels and across all aspects of your organisation. Expectations should aim to foster healthy sporting environments that are safe, accessible, inclusive and equitable and where people feel respected, welcome, involved and valued. Consultation with relevant stakeholders, including priority populations, is an important step in developing standards and expectations about behaviour. Having a strong review and evaluation processes will support you to know if expectations about behaviour are met and if improvements are required.

Facilities and activities are accessible

For many people, being able to participate in your sport comes down to practical issues such as cost, transport or physical access. Identifying and addressing practical access issues to your facilities, the activities you host, your website and key publications (e.g. policies and procedures) helps ensure safe and equitable access for everyone. Consultation with relevant stakeholders, including priority populations, is important in developing accessible facilities and activities.
